HUMAN RELATIONS AMONG TEACHERS

Antonio B. Venegas Jr. – Head Teacher III

Hermosa National High School

TEACHERS must be aware of the value of human relationship so as to become effective in conveying knowledge to students. A teacher is constantly in contact with his students. But sometimes, he is influenced by the other person.

Human relationship has been defined as the art of getting along well with other people. It is acceptably an active force that affects pleasant experience.

With the increase in population and with the onset of modernization, teacher realizes that he has to relate with more and more students, of different values, attitudes, preferences, likings and character. This might appear to be very difficult task and complicated.

A teacher should be equipped with more potential, opportunities and a sense of adaptability. Teachers must be understanding, sympathetic and possess helpful attitude to boost the morale of the students. Of course, a teacher is entitled to love, respect and a sense of consideration for his well-being.

A successful teacher is a human being full of love and compassion to other people especially to his students. He gets along well with others. His words and actions are very acceptable to other people.

Faulty human relations are responsible for many problems and unpleasant situations and conditions in life. Good human relation among teachers is important in the learning process of the students.

Good human relationship must be possessed by anyone to be able to become productive in the society. In this manner, a person also becomes an active force for the pleasant experience of everyone in the society.
Teachers, as living in the society, must relate effectively to the people around them particularly to co-mentors and the students. This is vital so as ensure the effective conveying of knowledge to the students.

References:
Human Relations in Education
By: Carol Hall and Eric Hall