EMPLOYEES' BEHAVIOR IN THE WORKPLACE

by:
Ma. Liza A. Manuel

A company or any organization needs ideal and efficient employees. Hence, an employee needs to determine and practice the proper behavior in the workplace. This will ensure good relationship, respect, appreciation higher yield of productivity and a healthy work culture. An employee needs to behave properly inside and even outside the work environment. Therefore, adhering to the policy, rules and regulations of the company or organization is a must. The ideal workplace is determined by employees who are inspired or motivated and efficient in their work.

They positively interact and collaborate with co-workers and most of all they possess and emanate the values of the company or institution. Employees needless to say, must feel happy and comfortable in their work. One important values in the workplace is being humble. Your good works can easily be recognized, and it is not bad for an employee to make mistakes, admit them but ensure that you will be willing to learn from these mistakes. Being adaptable to the changing situations in the office is very much appreciated, and to be able to work with the team is a quality of an efficient worker. An employee must practice dependability, being approachable, and willing to share talents with others, especially to new comers. On the other hand, shouting with co- workers, spreading rumors in the office and sexual harassment is a big "'no" to employees. Possessing the positive qualities and behaviors in the workplace is a big factor for the high productivity not only of the employees but of the organization as a whole. The conclusion is that there is a lot of well-founded knowledge, especially about the aptitudes of employees, but on the other hand one finds remarkable ignorance on behaviour which has no direct relation to performance and on the impacts of specific work and organizational condition.

References:

Retrieved from https://www. managementguides.com