When the Covid19 Virus invaded the Philippines, the Department of Education switched from face-to-face training to online/blended, modular, radio-based, and television-based instructions. A series of webinars were held in various schools, divisions, regional offices, and national offices to help the department create its fundamental learning continuity plan, in which teachers, parents, and other stakeholders played a vital role.

Due to the pandemic, about 27 million students in the Philippines have been affected by school closures. Some are wondering whether the adoption of online learning and modular learning will continue to exist post-pandemic, and how such a shift will affect the Philippine educational system?

Millions of parents have also stepped up to assume responsibility for their children's education. Most parents are exerting every effort under extremely difficult conditions to prevent and lessen the serious interruption to learning caused by school closures. The most inspiring success stories have been those in which parents and teachers have found ways to collaborate on behalf of children and teenagers. It encourages more teachers and parents to interact and work together to guarantee that children continue to study despite the pandemic.

Parents serve as an important connection between their children and their schools. We must conclude that parents and teachers are modern-day heroes because of the necessity of a healthy and robust collaboration between parents and teachers. They deserve unconditional support in their efforts to keep their children learning.
