Education is important to everyone because the future of every person depends on it. In the modern world, going to school and receiving quality education is essential for success. But two years ago, our country has faced and experienced a pandemic where everyone was ordered to stay only at home. How can children go to school so that they can study? How can they continue to study while they are at home? These are the questions and challenges the Department of Education must address.

This is not the time to propagate fear skepticism because this is the time to accept and face the challenge to deliver education to young people in any way. The department implemented different learning modalities to assure that learning will not stop. Online classes are used to access to internet connection technology and online platform that will help between teachers and learners. Televisions and radios are also used to deliver lessons while the learners are staying at home. And for learners who have no television, radio or internet connection, the method used is modular. Parents of children go to school to pick up and submit modules. However, teachers deliver or take the modules to children living in remote areas to make sure that they can follow and learn the lessons. Though the new normal is far different from the previous normal teaching and learning, it still ensures that all students are given the opportunity to continue their education.

Indeed, the pandemic and the new education system in the country have taught us all many lessons. During this trying time of pandemic, every effort must be given to every child. "No learner should be left behind".
