Can one measure love? Can anybody price the care that was given? And, if you love a person can you express it in numbers?

We may answer these questions in different ways. Our opinions may vary depending on how we look at it. But one thing is for sure, care and love always come together. You cannot say that you love a person when you don't care about him or the other way around. Love is care and care is love.

I have been in this profession unplanned but loving it is a thought I have learned through the years. Meeting and dealing with diverse learners in terms of attitude, beliefs and capacity makes teaching profession a really challenging and no dull moment profession. Aside from the idea that I am already in it so I have to learn to like it. I must admit that different kinds of students mark a special part for the reasons behind the love that I have now for this profession.

As an educator loves teaching, affection toward the learners must be reflected too. This love may be shown through expressing our care to the learners in our own simple ways as teachers.

Giving respect to the teaching profession must correspond to respecting the needs of the learners and doing actions to accommodate those. Giving importance to this noble title must match a significant part of a teacher to the lives of his students. And, prioritizing the teaching career is not prioritizing only the professional growth of an educator but also putting the learners on the top of the line.

Hence, love and care of an educator to the profession can be seen and proved by showing the same level of affection toward the learners. Certainly, this profession is not what it is without the students. Likewise, loving and caring for this noble title is genuinely honorable if it can be reflected on how an educator treat the other half of the deal: the learners.
