As one of the sayings said, "It takes a village to raise a child." This means that the community plays an important role in learners' lives. One may think that it would require a community to create a school. The community is the environment in which the learners live. This is also the place where the school is located. When it comes to learners, there must be a better communication between the community and the school. However, building healthy relationships between schools and communities is good. In fact, many schools have improved due to community involvement.

Community is necessary for education to exist. The production and transmission of information to people is greatly influenced by the community. It keeps the learner's feeling safe, secured and supported. In the appropriate community, the learners will learn to change their deficiencies into strengths that will enable them to be the best versions of them.

The effectiveness of education can be greatly impacted by the community's and a school's cooperative efforts. Strong partnership between the school and the community is the key to meaningful education development. Everyone is benefited when community and school collaborate to boost learning. This kind of cooperation can enhance learners' learning, wellbeing, and ability to arrive at school prepared and able to study while also addressing difficulties that are not related to the school. This also helps learners achieve their goals by increasing their effort, initiative, and ability to complete their schoolwork, hence, remain in school longer, and enjoy the experience more.

Whatever you do to promote more community involvement, keep in mind that when communities and schools work together, fantastic things may happen for the learners that will lead them to become successful in their lives.
