Why is education an equalizer? During the early ages, education determines one's economic and social status, likewise, one's sex. During those times, only men were privileged to attend to school because of the belief that women should stay inside their homes to take care of their children and husbands, and to do household chores as well. Likewise, those who can afford to enroll to learning institutions. Fortunately, such belief has changed, and public schools were opened because education is for everyone regardless of race, color, social status and sex. It gives no boundaries.

Like what Kofi Anna said "education is the great equalizer of our time. It gives hope to the hopeless and creates chances for those without." Indeed education breakdowns barriers of discrimination between the poor and the rich, men and women. Moreover, it does not matter if one enrolled to a public or private school, because at the end of the day, what matters most is the knowledge one had acquired which can be his or her tool towards realizing his or her vision in life.

Moreover, through education, disadvantage children will have the opportunity to change their future and escape poverty. By being educated, they are more likely to land to better jobs which can change their lives later on.

Indeed everyone has the right for a quality education. There are no limitations as long as one aspire to learn.
