

EDUCATION: ITS ROLE IN NATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

by:

Rhenn B. Songco

Teacher II, Dr. Victoria B. Roman Memorial High School

If education can contribute to economic growth, then congruently, education can also contribute to national development. Acquiring education fosters permanent literacy. And this educated and skilled individuals are imperative part of national development. They are more employable than who are less-educated individual. Moreover, when there are more educated citizens, then this eradicates unemployment rate as one of the national objectives.

Furthermore, through education, research and development, a nation can develop programs to achieve national goals. It could be programs from different levels of educational system which all aim for national development. Also, by providing quality education to learners, and learners will only learn to value education then, there will be no out of school youth and they are all in schools learning altogether. Lastly, through education, an educated individual as well as the economy, can innovate and utilize available resources with optimum level of possible outcomes.

Therefore, the government should prioritize giving access to quality education which brings worthy and satisfying life to people by making them participate in the national development.

References:

<https://www.linkedin.com/pulse/role-education-national-development-dr-donald-m-mccartney>