Because of the ongoing battle and threats posed by COVID-19, the Department of Education (DepEd) is instituting a distance learning approach or a learning method of delivery in which interactions occur between the teacher and students who are physically distant from each other during instruction.

Modular teaching is recognized as an effective teaching and learning process in which students work at their own pace by taking responsibility for learning to see as they know exactly what they need to learn although when textbooks and other educational resources are not available. The school has completely turned around from the conventional approach to education delivery and is now embracing the new norm. Giving in advance instructions, virtual discussion, and occasionally just email and chat conversations have replaced the conventional in-person teaching and learning process.

Therefore, it is a positive indicator that the Department of Education (DepEd) insists that education must continue despite the so-called "new normal" in the wake of the COVID-19 pandemic. Nevertheless, learning should still occur even when students are not attending school as usual.

Learning will continue to occur regardless of the four corners of the classroom, as modular instruction will provide the redefinition of horizons, the acquisition of new abilities, and the contribution to the learner's development. They will acquire and develop valuable skills such as commitment, initiative, consciousness, and all the aspirations to be revealed by participating in this approach.

Furthermore, rather than the traditional method of opening their book on a page, turning their module to a page...is the new trend today!
