Due to pandemic, children have spent the last two years in their home. The method of instruction back then was through modules. Some teachers were able to connect electronically with their students while others were able to teach through radio-based instruction. As a result, even though every effort was made to reach out to our pupils, education was not able to convey knowledge as effectively as we teachers do face to face. Unfortunately, the quality of education has declined. The collaboration of the parents was one of many criteria that must be considered.

We, as teachers, academic and curricular activities in school. We make sure that kids can read and write, count, and do basic math. We perform these activities out of a love for children and a passion for our profession, until something unexpected happened.

The global pandemic known as COVID 19 had an impact on every aspect of life, including schooling. The education department can help teachers deal with this scenario. They provide the necessary resources, hold trainings, and host webinars so that employees may adapt to these circumstances. But it's unfortunate to note that the parents, who are the most crucial component in ensuring that schooling continues despite a pandemic, were not around.

The support of the parents is crucial. Tango requires two people. Without the other, we cannot move forward. Parents should be the one to teach their children because they were at home. They should teach their children and not to answer everything on their behalf. Giving assistance with their activity sheets, modules, homework, and quarterly assessment test do really matter.

Dear parents, we need your help as we manage this new normal circumstance. Children have difficulties with reading and numeracy. Share the load. We can teach them in the classroom, but kindly assist them at home. Spend some time practicing reading and math at home. If we support them, they can endure and overcome these challenging periods. Always keep in mind how important cooperation is.
