

STAKEHOLDERS INVOLVEMENT TO THE SUCCESS OF DELIVERING QUALITY EDUCATION

by:
Cyrene N. Soterio
LPT

The school helps learners acquire skills in socialization, communication, and academic skill development. Similarly, schools are places that provide a place for parents and other stakeholders to engage in the Department of Education (DepEd) teaching and learning processes and other educational reforms. However, the development of quality education is not a school's monopoly. Working hand in hand with schools, they are people who complement and supplement each other in achieving the desired educational goals for learners. Therefore, school staff and other school partners should pay attention to the well-being and performance of learners at school. They are responsible for being involved and sufficiently responsive to learner problems and/or development in school. With their help in educating learners, active cooperation and communication between the school and them will facilitate the progress of learners and achieve better academic performance.

Schools are considered as places that provide an appropriate learning environment for learners, but the importance of stakeholders cannot be ignored. Undeniably, they contribute significantly to various components of learners particularly in improving their academic performance. Their pivotal role continues to be recognized by schools as they are essential for the complete development of the personality and career of learners. More so, stakeholders have a very important impact on the learners' growth and development. Thus, the school and the stakeholders have the significant responsibility of leading and supporting the learners and creating an enjoyable environment so that the latter's potential and self-confidence can develop well. In this manner, the school in partnership with pertinent stakeholders have the responsibility of nurturing the learners to become responsible citizens of the world.

School leaders need to take the lead and build strong partnerships from the beginning of the school year. Parents and community members should have a strong vested interest in the school's success and share ownership of the results achieved. Schools exist to meet the educational needs of their communities. Community schools are at their best when they focus on specific goal-oriented outcomes such as if you are consistently successful in enabling every student to become successful and accomplishing your mission. The community itself is at its best when stakeholders are aware of school performance, working towards better outcomes, and collaboratively supporting one another.

References:

depedbataan.com
The Official Website of DepED Division of Bataan