

EVERYTHING ENDS

by:
Ethel Joyce T. Bartolome

Everything eventually comes to a final conclusion, including work, love, and existence. Everything in life is transient, and expecting things to last forever frequently leads to intense frustration that is challenging to get over.

We need to learn how to end things in life that have reached their expiration date. It would be absurd to try to make these people survive when they are close to or have passed away.

Everything has an end, nothing endures forever.

The smaller domains of life – material wealth, beauty, and fame – which likewise have an end – reflect what occurs in the larger fields of life (dreams, intellect, love, etc.). Because everything in life is "borrowed" and has an end, both huge and tiny things come to an end.

Nature is conscious of its beginning and finish. Depending on how we conduct our interactions with nature, it plays its hand very deftly. The environment requires care. It adores the harmony that gives its existence the necessary stability. There is a huge imbalance the instant we disturb its existential standing. Nature will use all of its might to rebalance the environment.

Grief and loss are a part of life. We will frequently have to say farewell to loved ones, situations, or possessions during our whole lives. Nothing is permanent; not even our own lives do they last forever. Although we are all aware of this, we continue to conjure up the same idea of eternal. It may be very difficult to let go, to say goodbye, or to decide when something is finished. Similar to its opposite, which is to never commit out of fear of failing. Perhaps if we can learn to accept that everything ends more naturally, we would be able to appreciate the things we have right now rather than wishing for them later.

We will prevent several issues if we acknowledge and presume that everything that begins must finish. Not that we should give in to hopelessness or cynicism, mind you. It is realizing that we will eventually have to say our final goodbyes.

Any voyage must come to an end at some location or time. Nothing is eternal. Over time, even a mountain will become a plain surface. Never lose patience because of difficulties encountered in any endeavor, then. Instead, confront them head-on while being sincere and resolute. When it gets sunny, they'll disappear like the mist.
