Nobody's perfect as they are so. But being close to being perfect is not so bad yet fulfilling. The teacher is not the only major factor in the success of a child's learning; school leaders are also basic members of it. Their work is not only to manage the daily activities of a school but to be instructional leaders. Much study has been steered to regulate the features of effective school leaders and how these leaders turn their schools into operative learning spaces. Instructional leaders are interpersonally keen, qualified, and reliable. In the school, the leaders carry their own exceptional mix to the work and constantly replicate the day's events to promote life-long knowledge.

Possessing positive traits for a successful school leader are challenging indeed because there are many factors to consider dealing with it. If promoted school leaders are only motivated by an increase in salary and position without knowing how to deal with the system, many factors will get affected and deteriorate. When schools lack a solid foundation and course, learning is conceded, and learners suffer.

They should understand the essentiality of community building. It is indispensable that school leaders are evident in their schools and community and create trust and a sense of transparency and collective purpose with parents, staff, community members, and learners. It is no top secret that when individuals are rewarded and given breaks for career growth, as well as self-sufficiency and control over their professions, they are more prolific, more involved, and more effective overall. Leaders should their arms to let their subordinates grow with them too.

School leaders should foresee the data as a means not only to identify problems but to recognize their nature and causes. Leaders should be visionary. They have a plan or goal that they can unite her/his teachers and community as a team around and a plan to help them get there to achieve their school vision and mission. Passion is exclusively significant for school leaders, who stereotypically have a boundless influence on their school's climate and culture.

To be a fruitful and effective leader is no easy accomplishment. Yet, effective school leaders are dreadfully needed in thousands of schools and educational institutions across this country and around the nation.
