

HIGH MAINTENANCE RELATIONSHIP AT SCHOOL

by:

Kathlyn C. Caturao

Teacher I, Bataan School of Fisheries

Working in harmony with co-workers, co-teachers, or colleagues can be challenging if you have a relationship with them that requires a lot of work. It's effortless to work in a place where people help each other and reach out. There are many different things about a place to work:

A person who feels like they have to work all the time, even at home. They find it more interesting and fun when they have a lot to do. They think it's essential that work is gold, just like time is gold. Even when rushed, they still get their work done on time.

Letting all the work pile up, but seeing it as a burden, but still trying their hardest to work, even when things in their lives aren't very significant. They always help, even when there is awful work to do.

A person who is always funny and who never makes other people feel bored. Their work is like a place where they can have fun. Even the workloads, deadlines, and short meetings are made fun of.

They are pessimistic by nature, so they don't see anything good in anything. They always worry that everything is going to go wrong.

A person who constantly complains too much and always gives their best effort when given a task.

They are very energetic, very positive, very smart, very talented, or just always very lovely. Even when they have a lot of awful tasks and deadlines, they can make great things happen because they are always so excited to complete something.

At work, someone who is very religious and always talks about Christian life. They always show or say that they respect a deity. It sounds like a church service or praise and worship are happening in their classroom.

They won't let anyone go against their standards. They are always strict and quiet in school. They are good at checking even the most minor things about their students and ensuring the classroom is in order.

A new teacher, but one who wants to do the best job possible. Someone who is in the process of learning a lot about teaching methods and strategies.

A teacher who believes in keeping things simple and uses simple teaching methods.

References:

12 Ways to Identify a High-Maintenance Employee

<https://www.lifehack.org/articles/work/12-ways-identify-high-maintenance-employee.html>