It commonly occurs that a teacher must employ efficient methods while imparting knowledge. One of these tactics, and arguably the most crucial one, is the use of voice. Oral instruction requires a voice that can be heard. Vocal cues are just as important for an effective lesson delivery as facial cues like anger, sadness, joy, fear, and disgust.

There are many different components to voice as a human-produced acoustic signal. Voice pitch is the factor that has the biggest impact on perception. The vibrations that a person's vocal cords make determine their voice pitch, and the vocal cords themselves are a product of hormones that the body produces. The voice of the teacher, sometimes referred to as the language of the teacher, plays a crucial part in a successful teaching process during the learning process.

The significance of voice in communication is without a doubt substantial. The primary component that a teacher must possess is voice this is because effective communication requires that a teacher speak clearly and persuasively to effectively transfer knowledge to pupils and get their full acceptance of the lesson material. Voice tones are simply the emotions that are expressed in the voice, and variations in pitch, intensity, quality of voice rate, inflection, and rhythm are thought to be capable of expressing moods.

In this regard, teachers should be cognizant of their intonation, stress, and usage of high or low pitch in their voice. In addition to that, whether the instructor is pleased, sad, furious, confident, or in an active mode, these emotions and the teacher's style are significant factors in the voice control process that has valuable impact on learning.
