

LOVE YOUR WORK

by:
Josephine Pizarro
SDO Bataan

Not everyone is given the opportunity to be employed especially in today's very keen competition.

The increasing number of graduates in many educational institutions has made things difficult in finding a job and aggravated further by the scarcity of jobs available in the market due to the continued threat of the Covid 19 pandemic.

Retrenchment among companies be it public and private is still prevalent during this time of uncertainties and only those with good records and performance are usually retained in their job. Those who perform poorly in many cases are the first ones to go to the exit door. Definitely we do not want to be included to the latter. So we need to exert effort and be more productive. This is one way of showing how we love our work.

For this very reason, we need to love our work and improve our performance if we want to stay longer in a company or institution where we work for.

Having work is not purely intended for compensation although it is our primary source of living. We are happy when we have work and able to interact daily with our fellow employees. It gives a sense of accomplishment and upgrade our social standing. When we have work we gain respect not only from our peers but most especially from the members of our family who are dependent with us for a living. They are proud to say that their sister or mother is working in a prestigious and stable and known institution like DepEd.

If you have passion for something you love it increases your level of happiness. It motivates you to keep going. It makes your day complete. You wake up in the morning and get your butt in gear.

If you have work you are useful member of society. So love your work the way you love your family.

References:

<https://onpointexecutivecenter.com/what-does-it-mean-to-love-your-job/>.