Some students always take charge of housework, meal preparation, and childcare for their younger siblings.

Some of them are becoming disinterested in their academics because of these duties. Some simply don't have enough time for reading, playing, or studying.

There were problems with learning even before the COVID-19 pandemic. However, the epidemic created new difficulties by widening the knowledge disparities between those who have access to learning resources or platforms and those who do not.

Many Filipino students are forced to rely on online learning as the pandemic continues to pose problems for the nation's educational system. The internet, power, smartphones, and laptops are sadly not accessible to everyone.

Modules are made available to those who do not have access to online education. But not all kids can easily adjust to modular learning. Teachers have seen that most of their students struggle to finish academic modules on their own.

Being a school with a goal to help the students nurture their knowledge and guide them along their way, a learning kiosk was constructed to assist students especially during this new normal way of education.

Teachers can help students who are struggling with in-person or online learning in the Learning Kiosk, a quiet and secure area.

Each of whom has undergone extensive screening to ensure that they fully comprehend gender equality, child rights, and child safety.

The Learning Kiosk also acts as a depository for educational modules, making it easy and safe for teachers, parents, and students to drop off and pick up modules as needed. The Learning Kiosk may also give students books, art items, and school supplies.

Last but not the least, readers can find refuge in the Learning Kiosk. Teachers want to educate people how to read and to better with regards to their reading comprehension, regardless of age, in addition to helping with remediation.

According to research, a large proportion of children in the Philippines struggle with reading comprehension, and some high school students require remedial reading sessions.

A learner's comprehension of all other disciplines can advance as their reading comprehension does. Understanding what you are reading in its whole allows you a wealth of opportunities.

With these, more students will soon be able to read and study at their own pace.

By helping students at Bonifacio Camacho National High School better understand their rights to an education and skill development, this project, the learning kiosk, gives them more power to study and learn.
