A positive learning environment is the result of effective classroom management. It helps in maintaining discipline and good behavior among the students. The way the teacher teaches and the manner the students learn are influenced by classroom management.

Elevated concentrations of school engagement are correlated with effective classroom management. Effective classroom management has positive effects on academic performance as well, such as reducing disruptive behaviors and boosting academic learning and engagement. If the teacher can manage their classroom well, their students can learn the competencies more efficiently.

Classroom management, as indicated by the Core Coaches (2021), is developing a pleasant classroom community where your pupils may learn and achieve. Structured environments with focused, on-task students characterize well-run classes. Because it immediately affects both your capacity to teach and your student's ability to learn, classroom management is crucial. It affects a teacher's capacity for effectiveness and ability to truly Appreciate their work. Most importantly, a well-run classroom has a big impact on how well pupils do in school.

According to the University of the People (2023), it is important to demonstrate the ideal behavior and allow students to help establish rules in the classroom. Students learn how to behave properly in a school setting by watching good behavior being modeled. This can involve using courteous language when interacting with others, such as faculty members and students, keeping technological devices out of sight during class, and managing conflicts in a civil and respectful manner. Also, long-term compliance will be increased by having a discussion on classroom norms and letting students comment on the dos and don'ts of classroom etiquette. Depending on the dynamics of the classroom, having this conversation at the beginning of the school year or semester may help students view classroom regulations more favorably.
