

FOSTERING DISCIPLINE AMONG STUDENTS

by:

Rona D. Mole

Sisiman Elementary School

The educational foundation necessary for pupils to lead successful, independent lives should be provided by their schools. Student achievement is hampered by disturbances in the classroom. To provide a conducive climate for learning, educators and administrators must uphold discipline. The most effective method of enforcing rules in the classroom is often a combination of techniques applied consistently and fairly.

It is argued that discipline is a crucial element of human behavior and that without it, an organization cannot effectively fulfill its objectives. A disciplined student is one whose actions, inactions, and behaviors in the context of a school system are in accordance with the predefined rules and regulations of the school. Discipline, however, should ideally encompass the learner's capacity to distinguish between right and wrong in addition to following rules and regulations. The importance of discipline in fostering an environment in the classroom that supports strong academic performance is well understood. Teachers are concerned about it since it is a fundamental necessity for effective teaching and learning in schools.

Indiscipline can take many different forms in the classroom, including disobeying the rules, bullying, truancy, tardiness, cultism, drug and alcohol abuse, insulting/assaulting, sexual harassment, stealing, rioting, striking, starting school fires, "gassing" of students, and many other anti-social vices. Such irresponsibility shows up later in life if it is allowed to continue.

Discipline plans, meanwhile, give children explicit penalties for wrongdoing. Dissemination and application of a discipline plan are essential components of effective classroom management. The uniform and equitable application of behavior norms can be supported by regular reviews and training for teachers on implementation.

Keep in mind that establishing school-wide housekeeping guidelines that all teachers must abide by is the first step in effective discipline. If teachers are asked to manage unruly situations on an individual basis, some will perform better than others and will have a tendency to do so more frequently. In light of this, it is essential that the principal and assistant principals' activities serve as the foundation for the school's general atmosphere.

In the setting of a school, discipline is not a one-man job. Schools must establish high standards for both academic performance and behavior, from administrators to guidance counselors and teachers. All pupils should be supported by means of support and messages of encouragement in these expectations.

References:

South Carolina State Department of Education (2019). Best Practices for Supporting Educators with Discipline.

Osher, D. et. al. (2015). Addressing the Root Causes of Disparities in School Discipline: An Educator's Action Planning Guide. Washington, D.C: National Center on Safe Supportive Learning Environments,