Nobody wants to experience any type of calamity; since it will place you in a physical, mental, and emotional problems; and worst, you will face the risk of either death or serious physical injury. Preparing for disaster saves countless lives, speeds up people's recovery and saves money to continually improve their local preparedness and response capacity – ultimately preventing and reducing the impacts of disasters on communities.

Communities assist us in locating and mapping regional capabilities to deal with these risks. In the end, the DRR strategy aids in efficient disaster response while lowering the likelihood of repeat disasters. Additionally, by removing or reintroducing crucial weaknesses, it guarantees that our emergency response does no harm. Disaster risk reduction (DRR) spending protects our development achievements while also preserving lives and reducing costs.

They also produce social, economic, and it aids in locating and mapping regional capacities to address these risks.
