Yahoo! Students and pupils are excited whenever they are given chance to travel outside the school premises. Actually, pupils in the kindergarten are excited to go outside of their classroom. As the human grows the urge to travel intensifies.

While in kindergarten, students are just happy to explore the little communities outside their classrooms. During elementary and high school days some are expected to go on their journey on different amusement parks and such.

With the college students, more likely they can travel all over the nation and ultimately when one is financially capable one might as well travel abroad while finishing its own country first as travel goals are unlocked.

With this, what might be the proper strategy to achieve the full potentials of the travel education and how this might enhance the characteristics of the students or even individuals?

1. Travel is fun. When one travels and go outside the private room or the classroom, one is given the chance to see the fun outside and appreciate the value of other things other than what is normally and usually seen in his/her comfort zone. More travels, more fun.

2. Traveling enhances socialization. No man is an island, and this is true to all. Everyone needs company. Of course, one might have the me time, but we are born to socialize and we need the company of other people.

This is beneficial especially if the traveling is not the same with the culture and tradition of the homeland. This requires of course adaptation on the part of the traveler but while adapting he/she could get more experience and socialization as well as procure more culture and friends in the process.

3. Appreciation of life. When one explores the different sides of the world, one might consider how blessed he/she is as she/he sees different types of people and seeing that everyone is vulnerable to humane rules such as getting sick, dying and being poor.

Likewise, some of the small blessings one might have as he/she travels must come also with appreciation since traveling opens new avenues of learning and opening the minds to other people's challenges and problems. Of course, it is not always the good side that is catered during the travels, the real life exposes both the good and the bad. One must be resilient to be positive and accept life.
