

A SPECIAL MIND HANDLED WITH SPECIAL CARE

by:
Mariecris T. Evangelista, LPT

Having a learning issue or impairment that makes learning more challenging for them than it is for other kids their age qualifies a child as having special educational needs. They might struggle with their behavior, communication, or academics. Specialists, instructors, and nonprofit organizations can offer parents assistance and guidance. In this sense, in an inclusive classroom, teachers who are aware about different disabilities can better support children with special needs. Teachers that are knowledgeable about how to interact with autistic children can be more effective when training these kids because more kids are dealing with autism, for instance.

If a student with autism is enrolled in the class, the teacher ought to meet with the family to learn more about their child's autism. With this knowledge and a general understanding of the impairment, teachers will be better equipped to deal with any issues that arise during classroom instruction. Teachers that are aware of and knowledgeable about particular disabilities will be better able to handle their class. Elaborating the ways that a teacher may handle these cases is by also changing their teaching methods, many educators can assist students with unique needs more effectively. For instance, teachers can use additional learning activities to engage kids in their classes who struggle with attention deficit disorders. Children will become more focused while they learn because of these methods. However, teachers who change their methods of instruction frequently need to spend more time outside of the classroom planning lessons that may become effective for these children. Teaching young children while also taking care of the special education requirements of children can be very challenging. With more pupils in the classroom and limited funding for school districts nationally, this is becoming increasingly challenging.

You will inevitably have the great opportunity pleasure – of working with children who have special needs in your classroom. You might need to modify some things and make adjustments for others. One of your biggest challenges as a teacher will undoubtedly be meeting the needs of children in special education. However, no matter how challenging it may become, nothing can get away in helping these children. Education does not isolate anyone, thus, anyone can learn and is entitled to learn. As we continue to teach with passion and eagerness, we will eventually find effective ways to help these children through experience. With special care and special ways, these children can soar high and find their place in the society without being left out.