

TEACHERS AS SECOND PARENTS

by:

Jenny G. Pascual

Teacher III, Bonifacio Camacho National High School

The analogy of teachers as second parents has been used for a long time. For years, teachers mold students' thoughts and assist them in identifying their strengths and objectives. Some people view teaching as little more than a means of subsistence. Others, though, regard it as their very existence. Some people think that teaching students how to behave and distinguish between right and wrong is the teachers' main responsibility. However, teachers also act as the children's second parents. They are the ones who correct the students when anything is inappropriate, just like they would with their own kids. The lives of the students in their care are significantly shaped by their teachers as well.

Children absorb what is taught to them, making them like wet cement in this regard. To achieve this, the relationship between a teacher and a student should also flourish personal aspect. The children' growth is encouraged by their teacher. It is the responsibility of the teacher to make learning enjoyable for the students. The way a teacher treats their students lays the groundwork for a student to become more enthusiastic about their academics.

Talking to a student can assist a teacher better understand a student's condition in life, which is one technique to develop positive relationships with pupils. Some of them come from dysfunctional families, while others lack parents and reside with close family members. Teachers can better decipher why their pupils behave in diverse ways by visiting them in their homes. In some cases, pupils will freely tell their instructor about a difficulty they are having at home.

Additionally, teachers urge their students by providing the crucial direction as a second set of parents. A student will have more faith in their teacher and feel secure once they realize that they are valued by them.

Indeed, a teacher's responsibilities goes beyond simply fulfilling the requirements of their position. It expands to a more prominent position that might have a big impact on their pupils' lives.

References:

Đurišić, L. and Bunijevac, M. (2017). Parental Involvement as a Important Factor for Successful Education. c e p s Journal. Vol.7

Hornby, G. (2014). Parental involvement in childhood education: Building effective schoolfamily partnerships. New York: Springer.