Two things are constant in this world – change, and interest.

Charles Darwin's "survival of the fittest" seems applicable to all man's activities. The rule of the game is fundamental – if you do not fit, you will not survive. And if you succumb to mistakes, you will surely fail.

The Philippine education system is a constant metamorphosis of educational reforms brought by the demands to meet the needs of the globalized world. Therefore, the school head must stay active in the system bred by conventional leadership and orthodox perspective.

Adapting to educational change is the "new normal" – society dictates it. Educational institutions' practices are aligned with the rules of the world, which are changing at an unprecedented pace.

School leaders' commitment and professionalism are at a threshold. Moral purpose and change agency are implicit in what good management and effective change are about, but as yet, they are society's great untapped resources for radical and continuous improvement.

Two things are constant in this world – change, and interest. The second concept fuels the first. As for educational leaders, the only interest that must be considered is the learners' INTEREST. After all, innovations and advancement change, grow, and improve the route to a single destination – transforming learners into relevant members of a changing society.
