During the two-year mark of pandemic, the school had to shut down. The normal schooling of pupils remain out of reach and many students have been seriously affected their studies in addition many educators continue to have difficulty in mental health challenges, misbehavior, and loss of instructional time. In regards with these, our government launched modular distance learning wherein pupils will study the lesson using modules with the guidance of their parents. In this aspect, many pupils suffered mostly from lack of learning with the different subject matters because parents, particularly those who are uneducated have difficulties in teaching their children. They could hardly guide, teach, or give them the proper learning they need.

In this case, more educators meet problems such as the hardship along the undertakings of the students and the like. These problems may affect the learning stability of every learner. Due to this, schoolers particularly in kinder and grade one suffers from reading difficulty and most of them have difficulties in reading and mathematics. So, the result of Covid-19 pandemic certainly has a negative impact on the learners.

When it comes to online education, the main challenge is how to give practical lessons. Specifically, those that take medical science need to manipulate and do experiments. Hands-on exercises is hard to execute with the online education system.

Millions of youngsters miss school every day because of catastrophes and ongoing humanitarian crises. The situation of students in nations experiencing, recovering from, or afflicted by conflict and tragedy has been made worse by the COVID-19 epidemic. While everyone respects the public health decision to close schools, emergency preparations should be in place to guarantee that children have access to education even in dire circumstances. No matter their circumstances or place of residence, each of us is persuaded that every student has a right to an education. In times of catastrophe, education is a crucial right for kids, teens, and adults, and it must be prioritized.
