

SHALL PARENTS BE INVOLVED IN THE EDUCATIONAL PROCESS?

by:

Bryan Behn D. Meriño

Teacher III, Mountain View Elementary School

Education is a basic part of each child's growth, and parental involvement in this process is undeniably necessary. Even though some parents may prefer to leave everything to the teachers and the educational system for their children, a study shows parental involvement provides numerous advantages for both the child and the educational system. This article will discuss the importance of parents being involved in the educational process.

According to globalpartnership.org, when parents take an active role in their children's education, it results in a favorable attitude and engagement with learning. Because of this, parents' involvement in children's education is essential. How parents stress the value of education and how much attention is devoted to it has a significant impact on how kids feel about learning.

Parental involvement plays a role in establishing a positive educational setting for the child. Children who have parental support and encouragement are more likely to see education favorably. When parents are involved in their children's education, they show that they value education and inspire their children to value it as well. Better academic performance, increased motivation, and more involvement in the learning process are all outcomes of this positive approach toward education.

Engagement by parents' aids in narrowing the disparity between home and school. A parent's awareness of what their child is learning in school improves when they are actively participating in their child's education. With this knowledge, parents are better prepared to support their children in areas where they may be having difficulty and to reinforce what their children are learning at home. A parent's understanding of their child's strengths and shortcomings might help them decide how best to support their child's development when they interact with teachers.

Parent involvement contributes to the development of a sense of community inside the school system. Parents that are involved in their children's education are more committed to the school environment. This investment may result in increased volunteerism and support for school-related activities and projects. The success of the educational system as a whole can be attributed to this support's positive impact on the school community as a whole.

Noting that parental involvement should not be restricted to only academic achievement is vital. Parents can support their kid's education in a variety of ways, including by participating in parent-teacher conferences, giving back to the community, sponsoring extracurricular activities, and encouraging their child to follow their interests and hobbies. The development and general well-being of the child may be significantly impacted by these contributions.

For the educational process to be effective, family engagement is essential. Participation of parents in their children's education helps narrow the gap between the home and the classroom, it improves the learning environment, and develops a sense of community within the school's system of learning. Parental involvement encompasses a child's whole development and well-being in addition to supporting academic accomplishment. To ensure the children's success, parents should have an active involvement in their child's education and participate with the teachers and educational system.

References:

<https://www.linkedin.com/pulse/why-parents-should-involved-childrens->

Parents involvement in their children's education: A key to success | Blog | Global Partnership for Education

depedbataan.com
The Official Website of DepED Division of Bataan