The philosophical study of ethics was first developed by Plato and Aristotle as a means of figuring out what created a good existence. Later philosophers advanced the thesis that the only path to a truly excellent life was to live a moral life. This line of thinking helped the philosophical study of fair and unfair action evolve. This has become ingrained, especially in the professional environment where people have some authority as a result of their jobs.

The fundamental aims of education are to increase knowledge, acquire skills, and improve awareness of our glorious national past. Our constitution emphasizes attaining a basic scientific worldview and a dedication to the concepts of patriotism, democracy, secularism, socialism, and peace. The objectives of education should be academic excellence and growth in the arts and sciences, in line with the requirements and pursuits of our nation. For the purposes of this code, all full-time and part-time school teachers are regarded as teachers.

Teachers not only help students with their academic fundamentals but also teach them valuable life skills by setting an example for them. Since they serve as role models, teachers are expected to uphold a code of ethics. This ensures that students receive an education that is unwaveringly honest, fair, and impartial. A professional code of ethics that also highlights the role that teachers play in the lives of their charges outlines the primary responsibilities that teachers have to their students. Above all, teachers should conduct themselves with integrity, justice, and honesty with students, parents, and other staff members.

If one wants to lead a just and, therefore, ethical existence, they should act ethically in both their personal and professional lives. Here is where professional ethics start. A set of guiding principles known as professional ethics help clarify what is appropriate behavior for persons in positions of responsibility. They are still being polished after being made. Professional ethics are, in a nutshell, the rules by which we evaluate the credibility of authorities.

Along with their pupils, teachers must cultivate positive relationships with other members of the school community, including staff, parents, counselors, coworkers, and administrators. Teachers are not allowed to disclose private information about pupils or other employees unless the law expressly permits it. Any form of gossip, including making untrue statements about coworkers or students, should never be done by teachers. In order to foster an environment that is conducive to learning and development, instructors are required by the code of ethics to collaborate with parents, administrators, and other teachers. Possessing the proper perspective and attitude can make a difference because you might be requested to coach student instructors who want to become educators.

Since teaching is undoubtedly a noble job, educators must uphold recognized professional norms. These requirements are presented in an ethical manner. These moral norms are the outcome of suggestions made jointly by UNESCO and the ILO. They serve as a representation of the instructors and the subject matter of their work. The outlined societal expectations must be considered in teachers' professional development for there to be an efficient and caring government. This will contribute to the development of an educational system that can change to suit the changing needs of society and of employee support systems. motivating teachers to work toward improvement so they can lead fulfilling personal lives. In addition to teaching social values like respect for oneself and others, integrity, accountability, cooperation, loyalty, and honesty, a teacher has a responsibility to inspire students to study as much as they can. Teachers are expected to uphold and equally implement all school policies. Teachers are not allowed to purposefully denigrate students or provide personal information about them.
