Total growth and development among learners can be achieved through the use of democratic teaching techniques. Here are some various ways to strengthen learning among school children necessary for the teachers to adapt in their teaching-learning methods.

Adaptability: By its very nature, young children was given the motive to fully engage their power with the best learning ability. It is amazing that children loves acting and interacting rather than just merely passive listening.

Teachers and educators must adapt themselves to the learning needs of primary learners. They must understand their needs, interests, skills, thoughts and the capacities unique to individual learner. They should consider that young learners are active. They learn through their sensory prowess, respond the language through manipulative objects and are interested to engaging physical activities and hands-on activities to initiate better thinking.

Empathy: Children's attitude manifest in many ways especially when they explore academic and social interactions. Teachers must fully understand children's emotions dealing with how they feel or what they think. Children should properly be guided how to overcome difficult challenges and teach them how to deal with them.

Teachers are role models of empathy. Teachers are encouraged to create a positive classroom atmosphere----a place where learners feel confident, comfortable and supported in their learning; a place where friendship, teamwork, positive relationship and trust can be built.

Patience: Patience in teaching is very essential, thus, teachers must remain poised and focused; have the ability to understand any event of challenges. Children be given ample time and space to learn and discover by themselves; to learn and grow at their own comfort.

By guiding the children to be patient can help them develop listening and understanding each others unique characteristics and thus balance their emotions and develop love, respect and concern for others.

In summary, it is the teachers' responsibility to appl and perform theses keys to assure a successful learning among the children.
