According to Llego (2022), parents can participate in their children's education in a variety of ways. The most frequent ones are assisting with homework, engaging in school activities, attending events, communicating with the school, helping in the classroom, and supporting the institution.

Parental involvement is essential for ensuring that children's education is successful. Children are more likely to perform well in school and develop socially and emotionally when their parents are involved in their education. It raises behavior, self-esteem, and academic performance among students. Furthermore, it promotes a feeling of collaboration between parents and their child's school. Students, families, and schools all benefit from parental involvement in education. Researchers have discovered that students are more likely to succeed academically and socially when parents are involved in their children's education.

The benefits for pupils of parental involvement can be attributed to a number of factors. First off, the child is more likely to have favorable attitudes toward learning and school. Second, it offers the child assistance at home and in school. According to studies, kids whose parents are interested in their education do better on tests and earn higher marks, and they are also more likely to finish their education. Last but not least, parental participation can result in improved relations and teamwork between homes and schools. Brook (2019) shared a report from the National PTA that the most accurate predictors of student achievement in school are not family income or social status, but the degree to which the family participates in the child's schooling. It is evident that parents who are engaged in their children's education are providing them the best chance for academic achievement.

Collaboration between parents and educators can improve the learning environment for all students. Parental involvement in school has several advantages, which are obvious. Parents can support their children's academic and social success by participating actively in their education.

Parental involvement in a child's education is crucial and has a big impact on how well they do in school. Parents are more likely to assist their children in succeeding in school and in life when they are involved in their children's education.
