The ability to pursue education is one of everyone's rights. When they are young, everyone dreams of attending school. In modern society, every child looks forward to what they will learn at school. Not every child is fortunate enough to have access to education for a myriad of reasons.

Children who are denied the opportunity to acquire knowledge and experience the world of education and wisdom. What causes them specifically? Being impoverished financially comes first. Secondly, they have to start working early to support the family. Third, where they live in relation to the school, and lastly, their gender. These are a few of the causes behind the inability of certain kids to learn. As a teacher, it breaks my heart to see kids who ought to be in school learning lessons but, for whatever reason, decide not to attend.

Some students did not want to study for gender-related reasons, but as generations have changed, it has become one of their motivations. Many people encounter gender-based prejudice, and many are scared to attempt it because they fear what other people will think of them if they do. It is challenging for LGBT students to be given equitable access to education. Since I am among those who have been the target of harsh remarks because of my gender.

The system is always changing along with the world, and most importantly, people are well-informed about everyone's entitlement to an equal and fair education. They are coming around to accepting members of the LGBT community who are of the other sex in society. In addition to providing students with the opportunity to express themselves within natural constraints and restrictions, DepEd guarantees equitable access to high-quality education for all genders.

All LGBT students are delighted that they are treated equally in the classroom. Regardless of the gender they choose, they have equal access to education. They still rank among DepEd's objectives and aspirations for gender inclusion for all. They are people who want to learn and utilize that knowledge to transcend poverty; their ability as students will not be determined by what's between their thighs. Everyone having access to education is an excellent foundation for raising social standards more significantly. The regulations that guarantee everyone's equality, regardless of gender, are welcomed with open arms by today's students.
