Education is one of the most important aspects of every individual's life; hence, the role of parents in molding a successful learner is undeniable. Support from parents for their children's education has a significant impact on their academic achievement, the formation of good attitudes, and their general development. Socialization and education of children are joint responsibilities between parents and schools.

Education starts at home. It is cliché but this is very true. As a result, the transition from being home to primary school can be challenging on the part of the learner. Learners in elementary school are about to enter a phase of life where changes are starting to occur in their social, emotional, cognitive, and psychological makeup. Parental participation and encouragement throughout this period are essential to their academic success. Based on research, learners with parents who are engaged in their education are more likely to attend school consistently, have better self-esteem, receive good grades, and behave better both inside and outside of the classroom.

In addition, parental support fosters a good rapport between parents and children. A light and peaceful family relationship results from open communication and respecting the needs and feelings of the pupils. Parents who intervene and care for their children show respect and love, which strengthens their emotional bond.

In conclusion, parental involvement for education is a crucial element in their children's achievements. Through offering emotional encouragement, engaging in academic activities, and fostering positive mindsets, parents significantly influence their children's preparation for a better tomorrow. Their involvement not only aids students in their academics but also in their growth as capable and accomplished individuals.
