

CREATING A LOVE FOR READING AMONG YOUNG LEARNERS

by:
Angeli M. De Guzman
Teacher III, San Benito Elementary School

In the eyes of a child, books can be doors to new worlds, magical places, and endless adventures. But for that spark to light up, someone must first gently guide them to open the pages.

Helping young learners develop a love for reading is one of the most beautiful gifts we can offer. It starts with simple, meaningful moments. A bedtime story, a teacher reading with emotion, or a colorful book placed in a child's hands at just the right time.

Children are naturally curious, and reading gives them a chance to explore their imagination while learning about the world around them. But to truly enjoy reading, they need to feel connected to it. That is why it's so important to give them stories they can relate to. Books with characters who look like them, face challenges they understand, or go on adventures they dream about.

Creating a reading-friendly environment also makes a big difference. A cozy reading corner in the classroom, access to age-appropriate books, and time set aside for reading every day all help build a routine that makes reading feel fun, not forced. Inserted with a word a day and a paragraph a week so that children can learn new words everyday and a story that will develop their vocabulary and comprehension skills.

Most importantly, adults like parents, teachers, and caregivers must show that reading is enjoyable. When children see grown-ups reading, smiling at a funny part of a story, or getting excited over a plot twist. They begin to see reading as something wonderful, not just something for school.

In the end, building a love for reading isn't about pushing children to read faster or longer. It's about making reading a joyful experience. When children fall in love with books, they begin a lifelong journey of learning, growing, and dreaming. One story at a time.

References:

<https://www.edutopia.org/article/developing-love-reading-students>